GUIDE

A voice level chart is a fun way for students to learn how to control their voices during various points in the day.. The chart can be displayed vertically or horizontally. Adding in push lights is an added feature that students absolutely love!

An idea for introducing the voice level chart is to go over each voice level. Have an open discussion with students so they can understand the expectations.

Once students have an understanding of each voice level. Review the different learning times of the school day and provide some examples and rationales for what voice level is appropriate for when. It can also be a good idea to open up the conversation to students to gain an understanding of their perspective.

Then, you can have students work individually or in small groups to sort the different subject areas on the schedule cards. Once students have finished sorting the schedule cards, review as a whole group and then create a display for the classroom based on discussion following the sorting activity. The key is that everyone is on the same page and in agreement with voice levels for different subjects/activities throughout the day. Once agreement has been made, students can move around their pieces to match the class display, then glue them down.

Now, students have an understanding and a visual for voice levels. Before beginning an activity or subject, you can provide reminders by referencing the voice level chart. Have as much fun as you want with it. If your students enjoy songs or cheers, come up with a cheer to get their voices ready for the next thing.

For the editable schedule cards, you can type in subjects that are not included on the premade cards. The font and size are embedded in the file, however the font used on the premade cards is A Primary Kind of Life Tiny Hands. It can be found here.
